Dedicated State Tax Revenues
A Fifty-State Report

June 12, 2000

At the request of Philip Morris Management Corp., Fiscal Planning Services, Inc. has completed a comprehensive review of all dedicated state tax revenues in fiscal year 1997, as contained herein.

DEDICATED STATE TAX REVENUES

Introduction

At the request of the Philip Morris Management Corp., Fiscal Planning Services, Inc. (FPSi) prepared a comprehensive inventory of dedicated state tax revenues by state for public distribution. The enclosed report is designed to provide government and corporate officials, as well as other interested parties, with reliable data upon which to guide their policy decisions.

The report leads with a brief narrative summarizing the results, which is followed by technical issues, such as definitions and sources and limitations of data, and then a short discussion on the practice of dedicating state tax revenues. The narrative is accompanied by two sets of tables. The first set of tables summarizes and ranks dedicated state tax revenues by state, by specific tax type, and by the purpose for which the receipts were dedicated. The second set of tables presents dedicated state tax revenue data by individual state.

Summary

On average, states dedicated slightly more than a fifth of their total tax collections in fiscal year 1997 for purposes defined in statute or constitutional authority. Of the $416.1 billion collected from state taxes in 1997, 21.7 percent was expended for predetermined purposes. This amounted to $90.2 billion, of which 87 percent was dedicated for the following three purposes: transportation (34 percent), education (27 percent), and local governments (26 percent).

Just as three purposes absorbed the majority of dedicated tax receipts, three taxes generated the majority of receipts so dedicated. Motor fuel and highway use, sales and use, and corporate and personal income tax receipts represented 82 percent of the total state tax receipts dedicated in fiscal year 1997. Motor fuel taxes are the only taxes dedicated by all fifty states. In fiscal year 1997, $31.8 billion of motor fuel and highway user tax receipts were dedicated — almost exclusively for transportation purposes; 36 states dedicated $26.1 billion in sales and use taxes; and 23 states dedicated $16.4 billion in corporate and personal income taxes.

Alabama continues to lead all other states by a significant margin in the share of state tax collections that are dedicated for specific purposes. Alabama dedicated 87 percent of its total tax receipts in fiscal year 1997; whereas Alaska dedicated only 5 percent.

Perhaps a better way to view the degree by which states dedicate tax receipts is to remove motor fuel and highway user taxes from the calculations since all states dedicated these taxes. After adjusting collections and dedicated receipts data, Alabama still leads all states by a wide margin, but Alaska no longer dedicates the lowest percentage of tax collections. After excluding motor fuel taxes, Georgia dedicates a mere 0.1 percent of all other state taxes. In fact, six other states, including Georgia, dedicate a smaller percentage of taxes than Alaska once motor fuel and highway user taxes are removed from the calculations.

New York, for example, dedicated 10.9 percent of its total state tax collections in 1997 and ranked 41st among states. After removing motor fuels from the calculations, New York dedicated 9.6 percent of all state taxes but, when compared to other states, its rank jumped to 23rd. The reverse held true for South Dakota, which ranked 16th among states when all state taxes were considered. Once motor fuel taxes were removed, South Dakota's percentage of dedicated taxes fell from 24.6 percent to 4.6 percent and it ranked 33rd.

The percentage of tax receipts dedicated in 1997 is consistent with the levels recorded in prior studies. In 1979, dedicated tax receipts represented 23 percent of the total. Subsequent studies recorded results of 21 percent in 1984, and 24 percent in both 1988 and 1993. The 22 percent (rounded) average recorded in 1997 continues a leveling off trend from the more dramatic 41 and 51 percent averages recorded in 1963 and 1954, respectively.

Nonetheless, the percentage of tax receipts dedicated has changed considerably for several states even since the last survey based on 1993 data (see the table below). Some of the changes are due to revenue policy shifts and other changes are due to differences in how the tax data was accounted for between the current and prior reports. For example, Michigan increased its share of dedicated tax receipts in fiscal year 1997 to 55 percent from the 39 percent level recorded in 1993. This is largely the result of changes in financing public education in the state.

Definitions

What are dedicated tax revenues?

When a state levies a tax, it may choose to secure a portion or all of the future receipts for a specific purpose defined by law. For the purposes of this study, such action by a state is considered a dedication. Dedicated tax receipts may also be referred to as earmarked or restricted receipts, which brings us to one of the challenges of this study — definitions.

The State of Wyoming, for example, has specific and separate definitions for dedicated versus earmarked revenues. What the state calls earmarked revenues, those receipts directed to specific purposes as established in statute and which can only be redirected through subsequent changes in law or acts of the legislature through the appropriations process, are what this study calls dedicated revenues. One can begin to see the potential for confusion.

What is a tax?

Equally important, and equally troublesome, is the definition of a tax as used in the report. For example, to support 911 emergency systems, many states exact revenue from specific sources to do so. Some states describe the revenue source as a tax while other states describe it as a fee even though it supports the same purpose essentially. Likewise, many states describe motor vehicle registrations as a fee, but several states describe them as a tax.

FPSi recognized a revenue source as a tax by applying the following rule: since the determination of whether or not receipts are dedicated is established in statute, then the source of those receipts should also be defined or described as a tax in statute. More simply put, if statutory language called a revenue source a tax, then the report treated it as a tax; if statutory language called a revenue source a fee, then the report treated it as a fee.

Of course, there were also revenue sources called assessments and surcharges, which exhibit characteristics of both taxes and fees. In each of these cases, FPSi excluded these revenue sources from the report based on the statutory rule described above...a tax is a tax, a fee is a fee, an assessment is an assessment, and a surcharge is a surcharge. There were only a handful of exceptions regarding surcharges. In each case, statutory language defined the surcharge as a tax despite the use of the word surcharge in the tax description.

So, if statutory language referred to a revenue source as a tax, and if it directed a portion or all of its receipts to a specific purpose, then it was included in the report. Of course, since the study is based on state tax revenues, only those taxes actually levied by the state are part of the report. Taxes levied locally but collected and distributed by the state were excluded, as were state unemployment compensation taxes which are federally mandated.

Sources and Limitations of Data

FPSi reviewed the published statutes of each state and supplemented its review with state tax agency and legislative reports and documents, to identify every state tax in existence in fiscal year 1997. If, according to the statutes or other legislative language, a portion or all of a specific tax's receipts were dedicated for any purpose, then the tax was added to a state's inventory.

All data in the report was drawn from primary state sources. The majority of the data was collected from published state documents, such as agency annual reports and state financial and budget reports. Some of the data was prepared by state officials at the request of FPSi, or was obtained by FPSi from state officials by telephone. FPSi analyzed the revenue data for accuracy and consistency and prepared all tables included in the report.

Because of different accounting methods or timing concepts used by agencies within a state, some of the data presented in the report may vary from other published numbers. Unless otherwise noted, all data in the report reflects actuals from fiscal year 1997.

Table Descriptions

State Summary Tables

Tables 1 through 3 aggregate the tax data for all fifty states and rank the states accordingly. Table 4 offers an historical view of tax dedications. Table 5 sums the data by tax type and ranks the results. Tables 6 through 18 present the major tax types by state and rank.

Notes are appended to the bottom of Tables 6 through 18 to remind the reader of the following two points regarding tax collections data. First, the collections data for each state for the tax type featured does not necessarily represent total collections for all taxes of that type but only those that are dedicated. For example, a state may dedicate certain severance taxes but not others. In this case, total collections only reflect the receipts from the taxes dedicated and not those that are credited to the general fund.

General Note: the Alaska Constitution prohibits dedicated funds except for the Alaska Permanent Fund, when required by the federal government for state participation in federal programs, and for dedicated funds in existence prior to adoption of the constitution. According to governmental generally accepted accounting standards, there can only be one general fund and any other funds created by the legislature within the general fund are treated as accounts. The legislature has found it convenient to establish special accounts in the general fund to track certain kinds of revenues and expenditures. These funds are not dedicated for specific purposes, but statutory language establishing them uses the permissive, "the legislature may appropriate from the fund for the purpose of...". As such, with the exception of the portion of the tax on cigarettes transferred to the School Fund, revenues "dedicated" as listed here are subject to appropriation by the legislature.
